When, during the conversation, he causually mentioned the young lady's Lawrence county, N. Y., to Florida. eyes flashed darkly, and her proud lips compressed as if to keep back the words of scorn and detestation that such an act would call forth, but she said nothing.

When they parted for the night, Mr. Slogan pressed Vivian's hand, and each felt the other was no longer a stranger. That was the commencement of many happy hours spent together during the next two weeks. He walked with her in the flower garden and consulted her in the arrangement. He rode with her in the early morning and sang and played with her, or took her out for a row on the river in the evening. In short, almost every hour of the day they were together. During the time, this shabbily attired man, with red hair and eye-glasses, had won, almost unconsciously to her, a place in Vivian's heart the most wealthy would covet. Jessie wondered, Mrs. Rugby wearied about it, remonstrated and finally scolded, but to no purp se, she could accomplish nothing.

More than two weeks had passed since Mr. Slogan's arrival, when he returned home from a visit to the nearest town, whither he had gone during the morning, with a large value well filled and a letter for Mrs. Rugby. she saw it was from Arthur, and hastily tore it open. To her great joy, he would be at her house on the morrow.
